Altman's return ushers in new era at OpenAI

Sam Altman's shock return as chief executive of OpenAI last Tuesday – days after being sacked – caps a chaotic chapter that has seen the artificial intelligence firm lose some of the leaders of the artificial intelligence community.

The board that fired Altman from his role as CEO of the ChatGPT creator has almost entirely replaced the leadership team following a complex row over the direction of the company, with former US Treasury Secretary and president of Harvard University, Lawrence Summers, confirmed as chairman.

In a statement, Altman said he had been removed from the board, without elaborating on any specific disagreement on safety, “without elaborating further.”

The board said in a statement that it had sacked Altman because “he was not consistently candid in his communications with the board over the past few days and had not justified his recent return to the company.”

Altman, who co-founded OpenAI with Elon Musk and others in 2015, also owns a social media account under the name “Sam Altman,” which he used to post that he had been assured “The board did not remove me,” before adding “I told the board that OpenAI was moving quickly away from its stated mission of benefit of humanity, “for commercial gain.”

However, OpenAI’s interim CEO Emmett Shear, said in a social media post that it had reached an agreement to “stop the further spreading of technology and misinformation.”

The board said “to assure the community” it would not release further details of the agreement “at this time.”

Shear said the agreement to Qatar News Agency that reaching this agreement represented a “new success for Qatar in diplomacy throughout the world and Qatar’s ability to help in solving major problems.”

The board also highlighted the growing power of the country, which has been besieged for more than 17 years and that it will form an important framework of its important initiatives that it has been pursuing for four years and cashed in on the Gaza Strip represented a major success for Qatar’s policy, its active and national diplomacy, and its correct approach towards the Palestinian cause.

He said that the success in reaching the agreement and Qatar’s credibility, its extended relations with all the relevant parties, and the priority in the board’s work is the humanitarian pause deal.

Shear added: “OpenAI is currently working on a new system that will be launched in the near future to deal with questions and new partnerships to better serve humanity, and ensure that it does not expand and ensure that it does not expand and become a threat to the world.”

He said that “Qatar is providing the key to stopping the escalation and ensuring that it does not spread.”

“Qatar is working to stop the further spreading of technology and misinformation,” Shear added.

Shear concluded: “I believe that the success of this agreement is a result of the consistent efforts of Qatar and its extended relations with all the relevant parties, and the priority in the board’s work is the humanitarian pause deal.”
